Rajan and Rajeswar are both good friends and even a bit more than friends, but they know that the other has to do something for him, to support his family in India, and as both are working on getting there, they go off together to a beach. Rajan's plan is to go out and meet with a group of women of Bollywood; Bollywood as we now know it, isn't much changed from the movie days, but the ladies are more diverse than they appear in the movie and they make for a nice couple to have. Their plan goes wrong, they start to fall for each other, and Rajeswar tells Rajan off for being a bad-mouthing friend and starts to make fun of Rajan; he even tells him to go back to India and not watch Bollywood anymore.. "All through high school my parents tried to cheer me up," says Mowbray. "A river runs through it. There was someone I could turn on and make help for. I thought it was a big waste to die in the pool I'd worked so hard for.".. For those of you with any understanding of psychiatry or behavioral health issues, you're probably aware of the "toxic cult syndrome" whereby "the toxic cult" — the group within the mental health community – tends to indoctrinate (often severely), demean and shame others, especially women and minorities, into following their religious dogma and religious lifestyle. It's the exact sort of mind-boggling practice you wouldn't want to see in your child's school or on campus, and while I'll admit I had no idea whether or not this sort of behaviour existed in the mental health community at the time of writing this piece, I can honestly say the experience is one that should be kept in mind when you're considering seeking out a mental health professional because the psychological damage is potentially irreversible.

At a time when so many innocent people are at risk of drowning, with more people dying every year of drowning than from all other causes combined, the UK government decided in 2000 to close every swimming pool and allow the public access to them.
